Alpha opens the first column of this page. Readers follow the text from top to bottom before moving across to the next column. The authors ran several careful experiments to compare reading order in print. Each sentence here is short and plain so the extracted words are easy to check by hand. This column ends with a full stop.

Bravo starts the second column on page one. It must be read only after the whole left column, never interleaved with it line by line. Two columns side by side are common in journal articles and conference papers. The extraction keeps this column together and places it after the first one in the output. This column also ends with a full stop.

Charlie begins the left column of page two. Words on this page must be tagged with page two, whatever number is printed at the bottom. The running header above should not appear in the spoken text, and neither should the page numbers printed in the footer of each page. Only the body of the article is read aloud. This column ends the left side of page two.

Delta closes the article in the final column. Nothing after this column should be missing, and nothing from the header or footer should slip in between the columns or the pages. A reader hearing this text would never know that it was laid out in two narrow columns. That is the whole point of the reading order. This is the last sentence of the article.
